Von Katy Evans : Manwhore (The Manwhore Series) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Manwhore (The Manwhore Series):

Plot has a lot of potential, weak heroine not the expected ambitious reporterVon readerThe plot, billionaire playboy and aspiring reporter determined to write an expose of him to resurrect her dying magazine, had the potential to be really good, but I didn't like the execution. Despite being fodder for the tabloids by his partying ways Saint is surprisingly private. He appears to be a mixture of two heroes of the REAL series: Remy with his drive to succeed at all costs and Rogan as an aggressive businessman. Saint is desired by all but truly liked by few, he holds himself apart from everything... except Rachel. He opens up and lets her in to a certain extent. I liked his character a lot, loved his actions : supporting things close to her heart like buying the mural and camping out with her. I really didn't like the weak heroine, a woman who let others dictate her very personal life in regard to love, career, and morals. Rachel describes herself as an ambitious writer, workaholic, yet the woman NEVER works. Besides ONE article per week for her magazine and texting she does no work at all. The dedication to her job never felt believable. After six weeks she had enough material to start writing her expose (two short interviews, a tour of the new building, the auction in memory of his mother), but she didn't do it always wondering whether she should write it. Who believes a journalist leaves her/his notes on the desk in the office with a competing rival in the next cubicle? She claims to care for her mother, but one visit in six weeks. ?Second characters: Saint's cronies are charming and flirting rogues. The conniving rival colleague was necessary for the plot, well done, first helpful then back-stabbing. Rachel's friends, especially Gina, left a bitter taste in my mouth. Gina insults and debases Saint's character at every turn, although she doesn't know him, only because of her own past relationship trauma... and Rachel just takes it, ignores her own instincts. By her predictably timely interruptions into the couple's intimate encounters Gina seemed to be out to keep her best friend as unhappy as she obviously was. Rachel's mother apparently lived secluded with her daughter: no male relatives or husbands of friends, or neighbors who might have been a role model for the absent father, not quite believable, Rachel still suffers from the trauma not having known her dad. The story reminded me of Fifty Shades: #1: Malcolm Saint and Rachel Livingstons first meeting was very similar to Fifty Shades of Gray and the first meeting of Ana and Christian. A loof billionaire bachelor then is inexplicably obsessed with quirky reporter. #2: Young woman bursts into billionaire's life and reluctantly caves to his persistent advances. #3: Cliffhanger: the book literally ends at a door, instead of an elevator closing on Christian Grey's disbelieving face, it is the door to Saint's office. I loved the Real series with the spin offs, I am not sure whether I will read these sequels. The plot is predictable, worth another six Euro???

Gleich zu Beginn war mir Rachel sehr sympatisch, ehrgeizig, sozial eingestellt usw. Somit war der Einstieg gelungen und der Rest der Geschichte hat mich so in den Bann gezogen, ich fand sie unglaublich! Ich konnte mitfühlen, mit BEIDEN, und ihre Handlungen und Gedanken nachvollziehen, das ist mir immer sehr wichtig! Freue mich auf den 2. Teil!!! Absolute Leseempfehlung!

Kurzbeschreibung From the New York Times and USA Today bestselling author of the Real series comes the first novel in a sexy, adult contemporary series. * * * Manwhore
